

Be aware of this when dealing with the legal system

First uploaded 28th of August 2023 - [last edited 28th of August 2023]

By Aurelsson

Registration - When you register, you are giving away voluntarily whatever you are registering, to the party that you are registering it with. For example, when you register your children to get a birth certificate, you are giving away your children to the state.

Legally, they are not your property anymore, because after your consent and signature, you have given them freely to the state.

When the state issues a birth certificate, a new person has been created, by your request. The new person has a unique number and data connected to your child.

As long as you act on behalf of your person, your children will never be yours. When you stop acting on behalf of your person, you do own them, but getting them back might be a difficult process, albeit not impossible.

Application - In legal terms to apply is to beg for something. It implies that whatever you are begging for is not yours and you have to ask permission to the entity that you are begging to. That entity owns whatever you want to have in your custody.

Remember, even if you beg for something, you do not own that something. This all provided that you act on behalf of your person.

Consent - The legal system works fully on consent. This means that whatever happens to you legally, at some point in your life, you gave your consent or agreement to those consequences.

At one point you agreed on the contractual terms, being when you voted, signed something, gave your ID information etc.

There is a legal right by the system to execute the law on you, because you consented.

The moment you stop identifying with the person and start stating you do not consent, the contract that you made, ends.

Also the legal rules of society have the force of law only because you consented. The whole legal system cannot execute decisions without your consent. Also the legal system has an automatic claim against you, because it implies your consent, unless you state beforehand that you do not consent.

In other words: Your silence is your consent.

When you consent - by identifying with the person, by acting on behalf of the person, by signing something, by agreeing verbally or by giving the information of the person - you have established joinder and are legally bound to obey the demands of the other party.

Along the same lines: Statutes are offers to contract. When you obey them you have established joinder and have entered into a contract.

If you do not consent it is not legal law. Anything of the legal system has value only if you consent. If any rule, statute or act says 'you must', always realize that the word 'must' means 'may'.

You always have a choice not to consent. When you are 'obliged' or 'obligated' to do something, legally you can choose to do it or not.

Submit - In the legal system this means you are bending to somebody else's will. Your role from that moment on is to be submissive to the entity to which you submit.

Be very careful what you are submitting to, because in 99% of the cases it is not in your best interest.

Policy - Any policy in the legal system is an offer. When you start obeying the policy you have accepted the offer and then it becomes a contract that you must follow.

When you state you do not consent anymore, the contract ends. Not consenting means that you do not enter into contract with any agent in society.

Any agent is a corporate officer, working in the interest of the corporation, not your interest.

Think about these concepts and see where in your life you have applied them and what consequences came from those actions.